The lovely Church of Bacton, overlooking the Golden Valley of Herefordshire, is dedicated to Saint Faith. The site is an old one. A Roman fort stood in the meadow below by the River Dore. The earliest known Christian dedication was to Saint Foi (or Moi / Tyfoi), a disciple of Bishop Dubricius or Dyfrig, the greatest of Herefordshire's early saints. Reputedly born in nearby Madley, his 6th century preaching circuit included Moccas and Hentland. Bacton means 'Bacca's enclosed homestead'. This may link with the field named Cwm Sayce meaning Saxon / English valley [1]. Edwy and Alfwald were the last Englishmen to hold the area before the 1066 Norman Conquest. By the 1086 Domesday Book, Gilbert was holding the manor from Roger de Lacy. His motte-and-bailey castle was built ¾ mile north of the Church, which was then in the gift of a lay patron. In 1166 William de Bacton held a knight's fee, presumably in the area. A later Gilbert, a knight, was said to have granted a ploughed field (perhaps Lower Monk homs, also called Bacton ham) to Dore Abbey while drunk! In 1240-1241 Robert de Strettun was apparently the lay patron of Bacton Church. In 1452 the castle site became a part of the outbuildings for Newcourt built by Harri Ddu ap Gruffudd, the Lord of Bacton and Steward of Dore Abbey [2]. It was shown on Saxton's map of 1577.

During the medieval period Saint Foi came to be equated with Saint Faith, the virgin martyr whose cult centre was in Conques, France. Saint Faith's feast day was 6th October and this date was remembered as Bacton's feast day as late as 1796. Her image would have been placed in the chancel where the organ now stands, with a candle, or light, before her for special Services. This was usual and most churches were full of colourful statues of saints – nearby Vowchurch is known to have had sixteen images. At Bacton, these included the Rood (Christ on the Cross with the Virgin Mary and Saint John) which was placed in the rood loft, above the rood screen that divided the Church into chancel and nave. The steps to reach this rood loft can still be seen built into the north wall.

The oldest parts of the present Church, dating from the early 13th century, are the west wall and parts of the north and south walls. These are constructed of sandstone rubble, with dressings in sandstone and in the local sandy limestone. The stoup in the chancel is late 12th-early 13th century. A second recess is east of the main door. The doorway from the nave to the tower, the probable original entrance, is 13th century as is the window above it. This now contains modern stained-glass featuring Saint Faith. Alterations and repairs were undertaken in the 14th century and the two windows that survive from this are the western windows in the nave north wall and in the chancel south wall respectively. The other windows, the small chancel doorway with moulded jambs, and the south doorway are all from the 15th century when the Church was lengthened. As a substantial, stone building Bacton Church was used not only for regular services but for all parish business including the signing of contracts and the payment of debts. Like all medieval Churches it was lime-washed outside and completely painted with colourful pictures on the inside. Traces of colour survive on the roof timbers at the east end of the nave. Although the main roof timbers are late 15th century, several of the small carved angels may be older. The repaired, late 15th century choir stalls may have been reused from nearby Dore Abbey after its dissolution in 1537 (Dissolution of the Monasteries).

Most of the tower was added in the late 16th century. In his 1573 Will, Symond Parry, great-grandson of Harri Ddu, bequeathed

To build the steeple at Backton, £5 (about £800 today), so that the parishioners within 3 years of my decease do get a cunning and good workman to build the same.

Symond was buried here, near his brother. Many of their ancestors lie in the family vault. The tower was restored in 1907 and the clock was re-gilded in 1982 using donations given instead of flowers from the funerals of three parishioners.

Blanche Parry

One of Symond's sisters was Blanche Parry, Chief Gentlewoman of Queen Elizabeth's most honourable Privy Chamber and Keeper of Her Majesty's Jewels (from her epitaph in Saint Margaret's, Westminster). Blanche was Queen Elizabeth's confidante. She was in charge of the Queen's jewels, books, furs, and for two years the Great Seal of England. She accepted money for the Queen, acted on the Queen's behalf as a personal assistant, passed information to the Queen and was a channel for parliamentary bills. Everyone at the royal court recognised her pre-eminent position. She also intended to be buried in Bacton, where I have prepared a tomb – according to her First Will written at her dictation by her cousin and friend Sir William Cecil, Lord Burghley when she was seriously ill. This reference dates the Bacton monument to before November 1578 (probably dating to 1577) and it must have been glorious when still coloured. Its original position was where the organ now stands and so it showed Blanche kneeling to face the altar and Queen Elizabeth in the pose of Saint Faith. One of Saint Faith's functions was to aid the blind and at the end of her life Blanche was herself blind. The monument can now be recognised as of national importance as the image of Queen Elizabeth I is the earliest known depiction of her as an icon, as Gloriana. However, the Bacton tomb was unused for Blanche was eventually buried in Saint Margaret's Church adjacent to Westminster Abbey.

On the north wall is a beautiful, framed, silk Altar Cloth fashioned from an Elizabethan court dress which possibly belonged to the Queen. It was an honour to receive parts of dresses from her. This piece was professionally embroidered with flowers including sprigs of columbine and vine. Blanche herself may have worked the tiny additional motifs of birds, butterflies, caterpillars, fish, dogs, stags, frogs, squirrels, dragonflies and tiny rowing boats with their miniscule occupants. In the porch the Bequest Board records her bequest to the local people. Converted to money, it is still paid, as £14 each year to the parishioners of Newton (now Newton Saint Margaret's) and £14 to the parishioners of Bacton Church. Blanche Parry was a fascinating, meticulous, elegant lady and she is deservedly remembered. Interestingly, the other four bequests on the Board, dating 1660, 1667, 1716 and 1725, all include the residences of the donors.

Memorials

By the door is a tablet with two kneeling figures facing each other. Alexander Stantar esq., who died 5th July 1620, is holding a skull and Rachel clasps a book. Traces of colour survive. Alexander Stantar's inscription was evidently arranged by his widow, Rachel, daughter of Sir Arthur Hopton who inherited the lordship of Ewyas Lacy. The second inscription is to Rachel herself who died aged 83 years on 11th November 1663 and seems to have been added by her second husband Lewis Thomas esq. She was probably the then owner of Bacton Manor and the Hopton family were patrons of the Church.

West of this are two stained-glass windows of armed angels with inscriptions to members of the Bellers family, later owners of Bacton Manor. Colonel Robert Bridges Bellers (later Lieutenant-Colonel, 1824-1903) inherited the Bacton estate and became patron. He contributed to the erection of the present village hall and the restoration of the Churches of Bacton and Saint Margaret.

All the four windows in the north wall commemorate relations of the Partridge family of The Green, Bacton, in whose stables Sprig, the winner of the 1927 Grand National steeplechase, was bred. This new house was built on the site of a farmhouse by William Bailey Partridge of Llanddewi Court, Monmouthshire and Mrs Mary Frances Elizabeth Partridge (née Hamp). William Bailey Partridge (High Sheriff of Breconshire in 1904) was from the family of iron masters in South Wales. Mrs. Partridge served for many years as a churchwarden at Bacton and was patron.

The two stained-glass angel windows are in memory of Reginald Gardiner Partridge, third son of Mr. and Mrs. Partridge, who died in 1900, in South Africa, aged 20 years. The shield gives his name and regimental badge and shows the Queen's (Victoria) South African medal of 1900. The stained-glass windows of Saint Anne with the Virgin and Saint Elizabeth with John the Baptist are to the memory of Eliza Ann Hamp of The Grange, Bacton. Opposite, the stained-glass windows depict Saint Lawrence and Saint Stephen.

The Partridge wall tablets are of particular interest for, almost uniquely, coloured military ribbon decorations are carved on the two tablets for the eldest and second sons of Mr. and Mrs. Partridge. William Hamp Partridge was awarded the sovereign's South African campaign medal. His younger brother, Captain Richard Crawshay Bailey Partridge, won the Military Cross, the King's South African medal, the British War medal of 1914-1918, the Allied Victory medal of 1918 and the Croix de Guerre, the French decoration for bravery. He was killed in action, during the final advance on 28th September 1918, near Havrincourt Wood on the Western Front. The ribbons are shown on his 1918 shield with his name and regimental badge. Following these deaths much of the Partridge estate was sold in May 1919. The other Partridge wall tablets are for relatives and connections.

A tablet east of the door commemorates Arthur John Wheeler killed in the Dardanelles in 1915. The names of the six local men killed in the World Wars are given on the War Memorial by the pulpit. Nearby is the tablet for Percy Richard Davies, 1944. Another tablet is for Elizabeth Morgan and among the coats-of-arms is that of Hopton. The Thomas and Elizabeth Davies memorial is signed by the sculptor R. Parry of Kilpeck. Next to the organ is the tablet to commemorate the Revd. Charles Thomas Brothers, the last rector of the single parish of Bacton, who died in 1953 aged 90 years.

Further Benefactions and Donations

The organ was donated by Mrs. Partridge in 1894, in memory of her father William Henry Hamp, died 1883, one of the founders of the Dore Union workhouse. To accommodate it Blanche Parry's memorial was moved one bay east.

Bells – there are four bells:

- bell number three, with the inscription MORGAN on it, cast by Abraham Rudhall of Gloucester in 1710, the same year Rudhalls cast six bells for Dore Abbey; this famous firm cast hundreds of bells between 1684-1835.
- bell number two, cast in 1858 by the Whitechapel Foundry, who described it as 400lb weight is probably the bell recast and donated by Mrs. Partridge in 1907.
- bell number one and bell number four were donated by Mrs. Eliza Hamp in 1907.
Bacton's version of 'Oranges and Lemons': Be as good as you can Say the bells of Bacton.
- The bell ropes were mysteriously replaced one night during the incumbency of Revd. D.P. Richards who was thought to be the donor.
- The new oak bell frame in the restored tower was donated by Mrs. Partridge in 1907.

The reredos, erected in memory of Daisy Elizabeth Hamp Partridge, died in 1906 aged 21 years and of her brother Reginald Gardener Partridge, was donated by their parents.

The vestry door was donated in memory of William Arthur Reginald Ivor Manley (1912-1973), a regular worshipper and grandson of Mrs. Partridge.

Chalice and Paten

The parish also owns a beautiful silver-gilt chalice and paten, dated c.1490 to 1500, used by the priest for Mass and a photograph of these is displayed. This is a rare pre-Reformation survival; a second set in the county belongs to Leominster Priory. Medieval parishioners received the consecrated bread at Mass and usually only at Easter. The priest would elevate the chalice for the people to see and then he alone would sip the consecrated wine. As a result chalices were small. Bacton's has JOHN and CAPUTT (or CAPULL) inscribed on the engraved hexagonal foot below a knop with leopards', or lions', heads. The paten has the engraved face of Christ in the centre. Both are unmarked and may be older than the c.1479 Nettlecombe (Somerset) chalice, though similarities of design suggest the same silversmith. It is possible the donor was Alderman John Capel, died 1505 and Mayor of Gloucester in 1484. If so, the recipients were probably the Augustinian Canons of Llanthony Secunda in Gloucester. When dissolved in 1539 the canons' Herefordshire property included Fawley later held by Blanche Parry. In 1548, during the reign of the protestant King Edward VI (1547-1553), the form of the Mass was replaced by a new Order of Communion which required all parishioners to regularly receive both the consecrated bread and wine often. At the same time ornate Church plate, including chalices and patens, with other furnishings had to be surrendered. This meant that larger, plainer chalices were now required and presumably Bacton had to obtain a set. However, when King Edward died his successor was his half-sister, the catholic Queen Mary (1553-1558). She attempted to return the Church to the previous form of the Mass. It is possible that it was then that the parish acquired this beautifully decorated chalice and paten, perhaps with the help of Blanche's family, then the wealthiest landowners in Bacton parish. It would have replaced the larger, plainer set so hastily obtained at Queen Mary's accession.

Miles ap Harry Windows

These windows are no longer in Bacton Church as they were removed in 1811 to Atcham Church (Shropshire). For over 300 years the original 15th century stained-glass was displayed in Bacton's east end chancel window. They depict Miles ap Harry, died 1488, and his wife Joan (née Stradling), Blanche Parry's grandparents. Miles and Joan are shown, kneeling, either side of an altar tomb flanked, left, by their 12 sons and, right, their 7 daughters (many named in Miles ap Harry's 1488 Will). The Parry coat-of-arms of argent a fess between three lozenges azure has a central place and Miles has an open book turned towards him. He and his sons are bareheaded and wear long gowns, except for one son in armour. The foremost son is Henry Myles, Blanche's father, Steward of Dore Abbey and three times Sheriff of Herefordshire. Joan wears a tight-fitting cap, while her daughters each have a more fashionable head-dress, the hair being drawn from the face into a hood at the back of the head which was then covered by a thin veil. In 1811, Mrs. Mary Burton, a Parry descendant, removed the windows to Atcham where her husband was the incumbent. This was possible because the Revd. J. Higgins had acquired the additional living of Llanwarne in 1810 and so was not resident in Bacton. Claiming the windows were being vandalised, she is said to have gained permission by making the churchwardens drunk. She did give Bacton Church a cotton velvet pulpit cloth embroidered with her arms as recompense [3]. Later, Revd. J.G. Monro unsuccessfully negotiated for the windows' return by offering replacement cathedral glass. They can still be seen in Atcham Church with a second window of coats-of-arms and a representation of Blanche Parry's Bacton memorial.

Parish Records

Apart from the books still in use, the surviving records are in Herefordshire Record Office. The earliest are two 1614 glebe terriers [4] and two leather-bound books, with coarse paper, of churchwardens' accounts, vestry minutes, overseers' accounts and charity payment notes [5]. Dating from 1715, they are fascinating as parishioners are linked with their farm names. The parish general register, on vellum, has a few entries from 1710 on the flyleaf but the main entries are 1724 to 1812. After this, separate registers were used and there are also documents relating to the sale of the Bacton estate.

Clergy who served Bacton Church

Possibly the earliest mention of Bacton Church was in 1254 when Dore Abbey [6] was recorded as paying 10 shillings tax for Bacton. The abbey was famous for the quality of their wool clip from the sheep run along the valley.

On the 2nd August 1284 Bishop Richard Swinfield of Hereford recorded [7] that the abbot and monks of Dore held the Church of Bacton to their own uses by collation of the Bishop's predecessors. He stated that the foundation deed, royal licences and agreements in the royal court all proved this. This meant Dore, as rector, held the greater tithes and could present vicars to the Bacton living. (Dore also held Avenbury and Duntisbourne.) The pre-Reformation clergy were accorded the title of 'Sir' and here were usually monks of Dore. The vicar had to know enough Latin for the Church services, to keep proper accounts and he often held a school for local children. He was helped in his parochial duties by a paid parish clerk, a sexton and a number of wardens. When there was a dispute over who should be abbot, the Bishop of Hereford presented to Bacton Church by lapse, as in 1388, 1434 and 1453.

Sir Richard, vicar from before 1334 - died 1348. In 1334 he applied to King Edward III for a licence to grant a messuage in Wyebridge Street, Hereford to Dore Abbey. He probably inherited it from his father, William de Wellington. It seems his mother, Isabel, lived in the adjoining house until her death. Both houses remained with the abbey until the 1537 Dissolution. Sir Richard also gave land in Bredwardine to the abbey.

Sir John de Porta, vicar from 5th February 1349 - died shortly after, probably from the Black Death which reached Britain in 1348. In Herefordshire the disease seems to have halved the population. So many clergy died in Hereford itself that special arrangements were made to minister to the parishioners. This vividly demonstrates how involved the parish clergy were in the daily lives of those in their charge and that most were living and working within the local communities. Among their duties was the giving of last rites to the dying, and highly infectious, people.

Sir Lewis ap Hykk, vicar from 22nd August 1349 - died on 19th December 1386. In 1353 Brother Thomas of Baketone (Bacton), presumably a pupil of Sir Lewis, was presented as a sub-deacon. When the tenth (a tax payable to the king) was collected in 1357 Bacton's estimate was one of the lowest showing it was not wealthy. On 26th November 1367 Sir Lewis inducted Walter son of John de Ewyas to Turnastone Church. Sir Lewis was vicar for 37 years, dying when he was at least 61 years old. He would have known three generations in some of the parish families.

Sir Walter Bunde (Bunde), chaplain, became vicar on 27th October 1388. The 1397 Diocesan Visitation noted that he was a good administrator and the Church had suitable vestments and equipment. He celebrated Mass twice a day on Sundays and festivals. It was noted that the roof and walls of the chancel were defective, with a ruined front window which was the abbey's responsibility. Sir Walter was accused of relations with Alice Torre which he denied and agreed to prove his innocence, producing witnesses in his support at the next court. Meanwhile he was excommunicated. Two other couples were similarly admonished but it may be that this was a Welsh form of common-law marriage not recognised by the Church but usual in the area at that time.

In May 1406 Bacton Church was one of fourteen churches in Weobley deanery destroyed by Owain Glyndŵr's forces. In 1419 the un-named vicar was taxed at 60 shillings (£1,400 today) so the Church must have been repaired and there was further taxation in 1432, 1435, and 1453.

Sir Richard ap Owen, chaplain, vicar from 16th August 1434.

Dom. William London, a monk from Dore, celebrated High Mass in Bacton Church in 1435 using a chalice, worth £2-13s-4d (over £1,000 today), which he had lent to Harri Ddu, the Lord of Bacton and presumably the lay patron of the church [8]. The Abbot of Dore also lent Harri Ddu a pair of vestments, and a great brazen pot worth £3 probably for use in the adjacent Church ale house.

Sir John Snell, chaplain, vicar from 4th July 1453 [9]. 1453 marked the end of the Hundred Years War between England and France and two years later the first battle of the Wars of the Roses was fought between the claimants of York and Lancaster.

Sir John ap Harry was mentioned in 1499 with Henry Myles, Steward of Dore Abbey (Blanche Parry's father). Henry Myles is known to have had a chaplain and it is probable that Sir John was not only this chaplain but also the vicar of Bacton [8]. He was the clergyman Blanche knew as a child.

Sir Robert, rector, was mentioned in 1546 and 1553 [10]. The 1546 Diocesan Visitation noted that his house, termed a rectory, was in the hands of the Bishop. The churchyard was not enclosed, books were lacking but otherwise all is well. By the 1553 Visitation the rectory was in the hands of the King. Subsequently Blanche Parry noted, in her November 1578 First Will, that the vicar of Bacton no longer had a house to live in because my nephew (actually great-nephew) Roland Vaughan and his wife (Elizabeth) did grant away the house wherein the vicar was accustomed to dwell. It is interesting that Blanche used the term 'vicar' which is what he had been when she was a child.

Later clergy were termed Reverend (Revd.). Their patrons included Robert Hopton, armiger, and Elizabeth his wife in 1569, Sir Bennett Hoskins bart. in 1680 and 1705, different Bishops in 1691 and 1773, successively named Sir Hungerford Hoskyns of Harewood bart. in 1723, 1778, 1802 and 1818, Francis Hamp esq. in 1835, Colonel Robert Bridges Bellers in 1884 and 1891, and Mrs. M.F.E. Partridge. Curates were employed when the incumbent was resident outside the parish and/or had another living.

Revd. William Prosser, rector / vicar, from 11th February 1569 but living outside the diocese [11] - died 1605 [12]. His curates included Thomas Phelippes (1584), Charles Price (1586), Thomas Price (1589) and Thomas Barnesley (1601). The 1575 Visitation [13] noted that the church lacked some books. In her November 1578 First Will, Blanche Parry requested that Lord Burghley should ensure that her great-nephew William Vaughan (intended to inherit Newcourt) should provide a suitable house for the vicar. In the 1582 Visitation [14] the churchwardens, Lewis Griffith and Walter ap Howell, complained against their parson for not keeping of hospitality and said that they had no monthly sermons, nor had they had any quarter sermons for the last year, though they did have homilies read every Sunday and Holy days. The 1584 Visitation [15] noted all well at Bacton, and so suggests William Vaughan had granted a house for the vicar's use before his own death in 1584.

The 1614 terrier shows that this vicar's house at Bacton was adjacent to the church. It was described as the great house which stands within the church yard on the north side of the church...which... should be the Parsonage House (probably 118 Public House and Orchard on the 1839/1842 tithe map). The vicar required a garden, the later orchard, as his own-grown fruit and vegetables augmented his stipend and the resources he obtained from the lesser tithes. In 1610 Roland Vaughan claimed, In His Booke, that the church was so ruinous that he had had to build a chapel for his workmen. Indeed in 1614 this was described as a little house called the Chapel within the Churchyard (tithe 117 House and Garden). It may actually have been an ossuary, or charnel house. In addition there was a barn standing on the south side of the church yard of three bays belonging to the vicarage (tithe field 114). The 1614 one little house adjoining to the highway (tithe field 115) was very probably the site of the medieval Church ale-house and, appropriately, is the location of the present parish / village hall.

Revd. Nicholas Corne (alias Cowper), vicar, from 21st March 1605 - 1639 or later. Ordained in Llandaff Cathedral in June 1603, his first parish was Goldcliff, Monmouthshire. He seems to have lived at Bacton and it is possible that he was deprived of this living for Royalist sympathies.

*The clergy during the Commonwealth have not yet been traced.
Diocesan records continue after the 1660 Restoration.*

Revd. William Peyton, by 1665 - died 1680. As he was also the vicar of Saint John Baptist, the parish of Hereford Cathedral, he employed curates at Bacton who included Walter Hurdman (1671) and Lewis Price (from 1671). In 1671[16] it was noted that though Revd. W. Peyton was resident in Hereford, he does duty without complaint. He chose the parish clerk who does the best he can. The Church was in sufficient repair with a decent Communion table and large surplice. The pre-Reformation chalice was noted. Everyone went to Communion and the parchment register was kept with returns sent to the diocese on time. There were no recusants and no-one suspected of adultery. Further, the churchyard fence was noted as part pales and part hedge. There was a terrier of glebelands and though the parish had no hospitals, there was a physician, a surgeon and a midwife.

Revd. John Willim, rector, from 4th February 1680 - deprived 1691. He was also inducted as rector of Dore on 27th March 1680. His curate was Charles Manfield.

Revd. William Evans, M.A., from 21st January 1691 - died 1705. His curate was John Chelmick.

Revd. Isaiah Jones, from 16th October 1705 - resigned 1723.

Revd. John Price, from 19th July 1723 - died 1773.

Revd. William Parry, from 5th June 1773 - resigned 1778.

Revd. Thomas Higgins B.A., from 8th April 1778 - died 1802.

Revd. John Higgins, from 13th January 1802 - died 1818. He also held Llanwarne from 23rd April 1810 (windows removed 1811) where he lived saying there was no parsonage house at Bacton.

Revd. Bennett Hoskyns M.A., from 5th December 1818 - resigned 1835.

Revd. Charles Proberts (or Roberts), rector of Bacton from 26th February 1835, and Clodock, - died 1884.

Revd. Collinson, the curate, lived in Bacton Rectory. In 1860 when he was chaplain to the Dore Union workhouse, he persuaded the Board to allocate £1 for a small library for the inmates. On his retirement in 1887 the Board recorded their thanks to him in the minute-book for the uniform assiduity and kindness with which he discharged the important duties in performing services of the Church of England and administrating spiritual consolation to the inmates of the workhouse.

Revd. William Graydon Harrison, vicar of Bacton, from 29th June 1884 - resigned 1891.

Revd. John Grosvenor Monro M.A., rector of Bacton, 13th August 1891 - 1904. As the church was in a deplorable condition, Revd. Monro organised fund-raising. He tried to restore the windows from Atcham. During restoration Church services were held in the newly constructed parish / village hall. The church re-opened on the 7th May 1894, the total cost including the tower (1907) being £11,000.

Revd. Charles Thomas Brothers, rector of Bacton, 1904 to 1952, during which time he refused the offer of preferment from several Bishops of Hereford. He donated three stained-glass windows to the Church: that depicting Saint Faith in 1905, and Saint Lawrence and Saint Stephen in 1921. He was also chaplain to the Dore Union workhouse. His sister kept house for him and his time at Bacton was chronicled in the monthly magazines, an invaluable record of parish life. When he died, after a tenure of 49 years, the parishioners placed the tablet to his memory in the Church.

Bacton joined with Abbey Dore:

Revd. Herbert G. Pickard 1952 - 1963

Revd. David Powell Richards 1963 - 1976

Ewyas Harold Team Ministry officially constituted from 1979:

Revd. John D. Johnson 1979 - 1982

Revd. Michael M. Edge 1982 - 1994

Revd. Arthur L. Moore 1994 - 1998
